Investigations into interaction of viral and host factors in the pathogenesis of HTLV-I associated adult T-cell leukaemia. In Japan, leukaemia is the most frequent malignancy in adult T-cell leukaemia/lymphoma (ATL) and results from infection with the human T-cell lymphotropic virus type I (HTLV-I). Viral infection is necessary for the development of ATL but there is no direct evidence that the virus is directly involved in leukaemogenesis. The mechanism of HTLV-I-induced leukaemogenesis has been studied using animal models that have different genetic backgrounds and, possibly, different susceptibility to the virus. While HTLV-I is genetically and biochemically more related to bovine leukaemia virus, it induces the development of similar pathologies in these animal models. It is therefore possible to relate the observed similarities in the two models with the molecular similarities of the associated viruses. It has been shown that a distinct viral protein is necessary for the induction of ATL. Further studies are required to understand the functional relationship between this protein and other viral or cellular factors involved in pathogenesis.
